Senate Unit Approves Taylor for CIA Post

Associated Press

Rufus Lackland Taylor, 56, a vice admiral and veteran of Naval intelligence, was approved yesterday by the Senate Armed Services Committee as deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency. The nomination now goes to the Senate for action.

Taylor told the Committee that the CIA should "in no way" have any part in government policy making. Some Senators have protested that the CIA has shaped the country's foreign policies instead of merely reporting facts.

Asked about his relations with Richard Helms, civilian director of the Agency, Taylor said they were excellent.

In some 24 years as a naval and defense intelligence officer, he said he had known and worked with Helms and many key CIA officials, including Allen W. Dulles, former CIA director.
